BUILDING TOWARD THE FUTURE

The new portion of the Student Union building will be opening in the next couple of weeks, finally completing the remodel project.

$88 million expansion nearing completion

By Kavin Mistry
Executive Producer

In just a couple short weeks, San Jose State University will be opening its brand new section of the Student Union building for students and faculty to enjoy. The project was aimed to modernize, revitalize and create a more enjoyable workspace and social environment for the students on campus. “We really listened to what students wanted,” said Cathy Busalacchi, executive director of the Student Union. “When we created this, we thought, this is where we want students to come. This is really their home.” The goal was to make everything more accessible to students. Instead of having to go to various buildings around campus to get information, students can now find everything in the Student Union. “When we started this project, we began for a couple reasons, one of the major reasons from way back when was we had seismic issues in the building,” Busalacchi said. They combatted that problem with stern attention to detail in the framing and structure of the building to help avoid future problems. One of the main focuses of the building was to ensure that there would be enough multi-purpose rooms for students to use at their convenience for meetings, group projects or anything else they might have a use for. “We never had space large enough as our student clubs and organizations were growing,” Busalacchi said. “We were at 50, 60 students per club and the only space large enough was the ballroom and we kept hearing from students that there was no place for them to meet.” Now the building has numerous rooms large enough to accommodate all of these clubs on the top floor. One of the more interesting innovations that they created within the building is the ability to have connections around each floor to rooms that compliment one another. Such as having media rooms on one side and down the hall is the computer lab or having the lounge areas

NEW SPARTAN HEAD APPOINTED

Third SJSU woman president

By Vasuki Rao
Managing Editor

The California State Board of Trustees came to a decision on the selection of a new president for San Jose State University yesterday morning, and for the third time in 159 years we will have a woman president – Mary Papazian. “Well I think we should have more by now but I’m happy to be there,” Papazian said when she was asked how she feels about being the third woman president in SJSU history. “I’ve always been a strong advocate for diverse leadership because it ensures that multiple voices are at the table so I’m really excited about it.” The appointment of the new president will be effective starting July 1. Currently, Papazian is serving in New Haven as the president of Southern Connecticut State University. However, California isn’t entirely foreign to Papazian, as she grew up in San Fernando Valley before moving to finish graduate school. “I grew up in San Fernando Valley right near CalState Northridge actually, I remember in

The first week of the new semester is always an enthralling and somewhat nerve-racking experience for new or returning students. However, there are countless resources around campus whose role is to make the student’s life easier. From Jan 27- Feb 2, three “ask me” tables will be around campus for lost or confused students back on campus. They will be located on 9th street, in front of Clark Hall, and the third will be outside of the Student Wellness Center. Mariaelena Marcano, assistant director for success initiatives, coordinated the “ask me” tables for Fall 2015 and is doing so again this spring. She helped out with this event several times previously and has seen first-hand how beneficial these booths are for students. “If you were to sit at a table for an hour, I’m sure you would get several hundred students stop by,” Marcano said. She admitted that many of the questions from students are logistical, such as finding a class or information online, and added that working a table is harder than it sounds. “It’s really nice to know that they (the students) know that this program exists, but also that they utilize the services that we’re providing,” Marcano

Sammy G’s pizzeria offers students a new taste

By Vasuki Rao
Managing Editor

Most San Jose State University students are familiar with the independent and quaint Robert’s Bookstore that has been in business since 1958. The space has been empty ever since until Sammy G’s, a pizzeria plus bar, took over the building this month and its grand opening was on Saturday. The idea of opening the pizzeria started with Sam Ghadiri, who after finishing law school, wanted to pursue his passion of food. He approached his fraternity brother Nick Adler and proposed the idea. “Nick and I went to the same fraternity in college and we lived in the same house for three and a half years and stayed as close friends,” Ghadiri said. “I approached him with this idea a couple of years ago and said I had an idea and a location.” Adler has been making pizzas since high school when he was working at Village Host Pizza & Grill. When Ghadiri showed Adler the location, he almost immediately liked it. “You know how Robert’s bookstore used to look like, so I was a little hesitant to show Nick the location but he saw its potential loved it,” Ghadiri said. “I had a partner right away.” Adler brought in Dan Levy, their third partner, about a month later. “Owning a restaurant has been a dream for all three of us,” Levy said. “We are very passionate about food, and we’re very passionate about making a fun place for students and other people to kind of get together and have the old days when it was San Fernando Valley State College,” Papazian said. “I left California when I finished graduate school because you know, you go where the jobs are... and that took me to the Midwest and Michigan for about 16 years and the next opportunity was on the east coast but I’ve always hoped I could end my career in California.”

Papazian said that she’s had her eyes set on SJSU because she was aware of the possibilities and is honored to have been selected as president by the board of trustees.

“SJSU is a fantastic institution with amazing people, boundless promise and unique challenges,” Martin said. “You deserve and need a president able and ready to make a long-term commitment—in my estimation, of at least five to seven years.”

Papazian said she has been following some of Martin’s efforts and admires her work.

“It’s going to be great to follow Sue Martin who has done a wonderful job,” Papazian said. “Our paths crossed sort of in Michigan when were said.

She admitted that many of the questions from students are logistical, such as finding a class or information online, and added that working a table is harder than it sounds.

“It’s really nice to know that they (the students) know that this program exists, but also that they utilize the services that we’re providing,” Marcano said.

Christy Riggins, a government administrative assistant inside of the Associated Students building has volunteered for the “ask me” tables several times.

“It helps because I know what kinds of questions to ask and know my way around campus for the most part,” Riggins said.

The volunteers are instructed to maintain a log of questions, as well as encourage people looking for a map to look online at a map of the campus. They also hand out little perks to students as they find their way around campus.

Another site on campus that students should at the same place at the same time and so I’m familiar with her, her reputation and I just really appreciate the great work she’s done.”

Papazian repeatedly mentioned that she’s admired Martin’s involvement in the student body by being present at almost every event and possessing an approachable persona.

Creating a friendly relationship with students is something she has experience with. She says that her interaction with students in SCSU is a close one. She often has open forums with students and engages with them at a variety of venues.

“The real sign that I’ve created a really deep relationships with the students is that they would be walking on the quad area right at the heart of our campus with earbuds on – which is what young people do – and they would cross over to say hello and they would take out their earbuds to talk,” Papazian said.

Papazian is also aware of the CFA situation that might affect SJSU in the future. She said that she’s had experiences with institutions that have collected bargaining agreements with their various working groups.

“This is a time of stress in the higher education,” she said.

Papazian added she is going through a similar experience in SCSU right now as the faculty is union is under negotiation with their system.

She said that nobody ever gets everything they want in a negotiation and explained that is the nature of negotiations.

“I do believe however that you can’t have a healthy, successful campus that serves its students as it needs to without a faculty that feels invested in it and feels respected,” Papazian said.

Papazian’s family is excited to move to California because of its familiarity due to frequent visits in the past to see her family. They will be moving onto campus housing and will be living in the presidential residence.

Papazian looks forward to meeting the faculty members and students to work together in order to bring upon positive changes to SJSU, especially improving student success.

In Papazian’s own words, “This is going to be fun.”

know about is the Associated Students General Services Center. They provide two extremely helpful services (among others) to students.

“This whole place will be filled with people getting their book vouchers and clipper cards”, said business finance junior Deven Bernard, who works inside the building talking about the first week of school.

VTA Clipper Cards provide access on all VTA bus and light rail routes, and students can get one for free by putting in a request online as well as bringing their Tower I.D. to the General Services center.

“The new one is good until you graduate. As long as you are enrolled in your classes, it will renew itself,” Bernard said about the clipper cards.

As for the book vouchers, Bernard stated the center offers an affordable book program; a $60 voucher for students to rent books from the Spartan Bookstore. They only provide about 250 vouchers each semester.

Students searching for other options might want to check the first floor of the Student Union, where a number of Student Affairs offices are moving to or they can search the different divisions of Student Affairs online until something catches interest.

a wholesome entertainment time.”

Students who live in the dorms usually have to walk about three-fourth of a mile to get to the closest stretch of bars on East San Fernando St. The lack of restaurants on the other side of campus is what makes Sammy G’s a game changer.

“The way the bars and restaurants are laid out in San Jose is that there’s not so much on this side of campus,” Levy said. “On the west side you have all the bars and restaurants but we wanted a place closer to where students live – close to the fraternities, close to student housing.”

The opening of a pizzeria so close to an established SJSU students’ go-to pizza corner of San Carlos Pizza was done in the hopes that Sammy G’s pizzeria is recognized for its difference and freshness in ingredients.

“It’s a friendly rivalry,” Levy said. “We’re focusing on fresh ingredients and freshly made pasta everyday and an assortment of beers on tap.”

Besides being another spot for students and families to hang out and have dinner, Sammy G’s has also provided jobs to San Jose State students.

“We’ve already hired a couple of SJSU students, some of them are in a fraternity or sororities and we’re talking to a couple of the fraternities to get their flags and some of their paddles hanging up on the walls,” Levy said.

Akhbar and Lori Khan who live in Naglee Park, walking distance from Sammy G’s, attended the grand opening. They ordered the pepperoni mushroom and onion pizza which they enjoyed.

“It’s great,” said Khan in reference to the pizza she had. “The fact that we can watch sports is another huge plus because not a lot of places have that close to us.”

When asked what the two must-try items on the menu are for first timers, Ghadiri said his absolute favorite is the Huevos Rancheros Pizza, a breakfast pizza and recommended a Grapefruit Sculpin beer to compliment it.

“We also have a daily special that is $8 for a 10-inch pizza and a drink,” Ghadiri said. “You’ll be able to get in and out of here within 10 minutes with a drink and a full meal.”

Sammy G’s Pizzeria is located on South 10th Street and is open daily until midnight.

connect to the Starbucks, so that way everything is easy to find.

Some of the more noteworthy additions to the existing building are a large Starbucks and lounge on the ground floor, along with a Subway on the main floor at the front.

“I think it’s nice to have another area for students to lounge and sit during their breaks,” said sophomore software engineering major, Kaanchana Allanki.

“Especially because the current one is becoming more and more crowded.”

Along with the new restaurants, they have also added a billiard room, with a drive-thru style window connected, so students can order drinks while enjoying the facility. Next to that, there is a gaming room, which includes various tables for students to use, as well as music pods and a bowling alley.

“We want to really modernize it,” Busalacchi said. “We are working with some corporate people and a company out of Texas who actually create games and we want to work with them to create a true gaming center. Also we are hoping that by June or July that the bowling center will be operational.”

The most striking difference between this building and the previous one is the vast open spaces that they have created. It has made for a more social and welcoming environment that students can peruse at their leisure.

“We are hoping to open it all in the next one to two weeks,” Busalacchi said. “We are getting close, it is just now putting in all the little details before it is finished.”

As we know on this campus, construction is never finished. Once done with the Student Union, the construction will shift to bricks housing area, which will be torn down once CV2 is completed to make way for the brand new recreation facility.

“Death of a Bachelor” birth of Urie’s career

By Melissa Hartman
Staff Writer

It’s pretty easy to assume that most people left Panic! At The Disco in middle school, but it seems that Brendon Urie has come to change our minds about that.

“Death of a Bachelor” has been released by the notoriously emo band Panic! At The Disco on Jan. 15, making this their fifth album.

Many have been skeptical of how successful this album would be, considering only their frontman Brendon Urie is left from the original band. Also, album sales usually go down the more bands produce them because of streaming services like Spotify and the new Apple Music.

However, this was not the truth for Panic!, being that their release-week sales were higher than they have ever been.

They even passed Adele’s “25” album and Justin Bieber’s “Purpose” album which sold 5.8 million copies and 1 million copies respectively, according to Billboard.

With the variety on this album, Brendon Urie deserves the #1 spot. The album is all over the place from traces of the old punk sounds of 2005 Panic! At The Disco in “Victorious,” to the croony jazz sounds of “Death Of A Bachelor.” Somehow, it all works.

There are a few duds on the album, like “Impossible Year” (that’s right-- I said it). This album is a huge success for Panic!.

These are just a few of the tracks that make the album worth buying.

“Victorious” has an edgy sound, especially in the verses and the strange metaphors. You can hear the old Panic! At The Disco in “A Fever You Can’t Sweat Out.” The song differs from many of the songs because of the addition of a more electronic sound.

“Hallelujah” is not the Hallelujah you’d expect. It’s all about sinning, being in love, having strong sexual desires and an overlying theme of being reckless and young. This is the song in which Brendon Urie’s voice is most defined, with an orchestra in the background to compliment him.

What’s strange about this song is that parts of it sound like it could have been recorded by Gavin DeGraw, whose music is completely different from Panic! At The Disco’s.

“Emperor’s New Clothes” is about taking back what was once yours. It has a spooky sound to it and reminds you of “I Write Sins Not Tragedies” in the verses. The background voices in the hooks of the song also sound like they belong in the Haunted Mansion ride in Disneyland.

As the title track of the album, “Death Of A Bachelor”, is all it’s choked up to be and more.

Urie flawlessly combines his crooning voice with a newer sound. The beat behind the song gives it an R&B vibe, but the trumpets in the background have a Sinatra-esque element.

There are also weird electronic elements at the end, which if tried by anyone else may ruin the song, but Panic!’s balance of creative energy keeps the song at bay.

“LA Devotee” is definitely the most pop sounding song on the album.

The orchestra compliments Urie’s voice like it does in “Hallelujah.” Urie describes a woman he fell in love with who was so caught up in the LA lifestyle that he couldn’t or wouldn’t want to change her.

This song displays great writing and the description of this L.A. girl is incomparable. This is where Urie’s artistry comes out.

“Golden Days” is superb and the first half of the chorus is the closest we get to an acoustic.

This song is about reminiscing on the past and wondering about the future. It is the most underrated song on the album, mainly because it shows great range in Urie’s voice.

Brendon Urie has proven that the golden days are not yet over for Panic! At The Disco and makes us hope they never will be. The album provokes many different emotions and plays with a lot of different sounds. It’s outside the box, but it’s brilliant. I definitely suggest that you go purchase the album from iTunes, and if not, give it a listen on Spotify.

REVIEW

Dirty Grandpa fell and didn’t get up

By Kato Guzman
Staff Writer

No one ever thought they would prefer to watch Johnny Knoxville over Robert De Niro but that day has come.

“Dirty Grandpa” delivers nothing more than a sad showcasing of the pits of Robert De Niro’s career as he clowns his way through poorly-executed jokes, over-exaggerated story, chemistry-lacking castmates and a second tier film to the much more enjoyable “Bad Grandpa.”

Dirty Grandpa fails in it’s attempt to be “The Hangover.”

Dick Kelly, embarrassingly portrayed by De Niro, recently lost his wife. During the funeral we meet his grandson, Jason Kelly, played by Zac Efron.

Jason and his fiancé are planning the final touches for their wedding which will take place a week from the funeral. Dick then convinces his grandson to go on a road trip to Florida. Movie coincidence interrupts their road trip as Efron happens to run into an old classmate and miraculously, her best friend is attractive with a geezer fetish.

“Dirty Grandpa” follows the typical trope of a guy that’s about to get married even though he hasn’t lived. The wiser friend, his raunchy grandfather, sees his hidden unhappiness and brings him on a journey to remind him of the person he used to be. “Dirty Grandpa” fails originality as much as it does comedy.

The film tries to be one of those movies with hilarious one-liner insults thrown back and forth, popularized by Judd Apatow. Only in this movie the insults are forced, unfunny and eyeroll-inducing.

Occasionally, one of the characters exposit plot summaries through awkwardly phrased dialog which seems to serve only as trailer lines or to catch up the audience every so often as they drift in and out of sleep.

The entire movie feels like a poorly-executed first act to a movie that promises to deliver but never does. The lack of authentic jokes seems to come as a result of the actors having absolutely no on-screen chemistry.

The script is as though a sixteen-year-old went through and sprinkled perverted jokes for the sake of having perverted jokes.

De Niro plays a character named Dick, a lame penis joke in itself; unfortunately his name is the most creative smithing of words in the entire script.

He phones in his clownish performance as he strolls through his scenes leaving the audience wondering if he even understands any of his jokes or just doesn’t care anymore.

De Niro, award winning star of some of the greatest acting achievements in cinematic history, graced many straight to DVD film failures recently yet “Dirty Grandpa” is truly the lowest depth of his career.

The only appeal of Efron’s character is his two singing scenes which only serve to remind the audience how little respect the actor has garnered outside of “High School Musical.” This movie is the latest piece of evidence that the Disney Channel musical was the height of his career as it continues to spiral downward with each new endeavor.

The forgettable supporting cast creates a cartoonish backdrop, but Aubrey Plaza manages to shine through with incredibly crude dialog and skimpy clothes as the only memorable part of the film.

The pitfalls of this movie are far from a surprise as the movie was directed by Dan Mazer, a relative unknown whose claim to fame is as a writer/producer of Ali G flicks such as “Bruno” and “Borat.” His directorial background is nothing more than a few TV movies and some decade old television shows. His lack of quality experience is perhaps to blame for the stale performances.

This flick gets two stars out of five. As terrible as it was, Aubrey Plaza was pretty fun to watch and it did manage to keep attention from beginning to end, somehow.

The Black List is a website which features a list of each year’s most well-liked but unproduced screenplays. “Dirty Grandpa” appeared on that list in 2011 along with well-received hits “Django Unchained,” “The Imitation Game” and “Maggie.” While filmgoers may scratch their heads wondering how such an awful movie came from this background, they should remember that also on that list were movies such as “The Duff” and “Sex Tape.”

The movie fails on all cylinders and any potential viewer would be better off re-watching Johnny Knoxville in “Bad Grandpa,” the best of the Grandpas.

The Force has awakened once again

By Giovanni Arroyo-Camberos
Executive editor

After watching the film for a fourth time, it still does not seem to shed any mark of weakness. Everytime I sit down and see the crawl text it's as if I am watching the film for the first time, which leads me to say that Star Wars is indeed back.

From Han Solo finally reuniting with his famous spaceship that made the kessel run in 12 parsecs, the Millennium Falcon, to the new characters stealing the hearts of all Star Wars fanatics, the film brings us back into the world of the light and the dark side.

Since this is a spoilers review, I will just come out and say it; Kylo Ren (Adam Driver), kills his father Han Solo (Harrison Ford). The moment was of course foreseen and obvious but the reaction from the crowd made it feel as if everyone had lost that father figure that could not be replaced.

This is one of the few surprises director JJ Abrams left us with in the movie. Another key surprise was the reveal that Kylo Ren is Ben Solo, the son of Han Solo and General Leia Organa (Carrie Fisher).

The reintroduction of the original cast from the original trilogy allowed fanatics to "awaken" their excitement for another Star Wars film.

There are six total films in the Star Wars universe before the new seventh film.

The original three brought fans to joy however not much could be said about the prequel films, which explains how fans are finally getting the film they have always wanted to see.

The film brought nostalgic moments throughout with the reveal of the Millennium Falcon when new characters Finn (John Boyega) and Rey (Daisy Ridley), discover the famous spaceship.

Abrams followed a too familiar path after essentially copying the fourth film "A New Hope" when we are introduced to a droid who has important information, a new "Death Star" called "Starkiller Base" and the new threat that the galaxy must overcome.

Although the film had several obstacles to overcome, it delivered in terms of creating a fun and familiar environment. The film was almost step by step with the fourth film but added its own twist to the Star Wars universe.

Ridley, Boyega and Driver filled the shoes of characters that fans could grow to love. Mystery surrounded each character building up to the release but each persona grew as the movie progressed.

Boyega stood out to be the comedic hero of the film, always cracking jokes and presenting opportunities for possibly becoming the love interest for Ridley's character.

Of course we cannot leave BB-8 out of the conversation, the loving and humorous droid has the potential to become as famous if not already as R2-D2 in this new era of Star Wars films.

The film has been out for five weeks and it is continuing its success in the box office. The film has set box office records both worldwide and domestically.

Among those records shattered, it has become the number one movie domestically in the United States after taking down previous box office champion Jurassic World, which opened last summer. Star Wars has $879 million and counting, according to Box Office Mojo.

It has brought Disney, who bought Lucasfilm in 2012, a worldwide smashing number of 1.9 billion dollars and the film currently sits behind Titanic and Avatar as top box office films worldwide.

This success cannot be the end of it all, of course from the beginning, when Disney announced it was making a new Star Wars film it was shared that the film would be one part of another trilogy.

When the original trilogy came out each film had a three year gap between when they were released. With the announcement of Episode VIII coming out on Dec. 15, 2017, we no longer have to endure the wait with the film coming out next year.

Abrams had to cover 30 years and bring it all together in the two hour window it had to explain where the galaxy was when the Empire had fell in Episode VI.

The film did seem a little rushed but it still left us with a lot of questions. Rey is still an unknown character, Luke only appeared for one scene at the very end and we were left wondering who supreme leader Snoke could potentially be.

We were also left with excitement, the possibility of seeing a potential Sith Lord in Snoke (Andy Serkis) going up against Luke Skywalker (Mark Hamill) is a dream come true for a fanatic.

The restructuring of Kylo Ren's persona is also interesting to keep an eye out for now that he has killed his father. The completion of his training by Snoke when the eighth film comes around will be something to look forward to as well. The introduction of new characters along with receiving the nostalgia with old characters made Star Wars The Force Awakens one of the top Star Wars films to be made.

One can only wonder what Disney has in store for the franchise after its huge success. Episode VIII couldn't come any sooner.

Welcome back Spartan Daily readers

Dear Readers,

Welcome to a new semester!

It's 2016. Which means it's been 10 years since Zinedine Zidane's famous head butt at the 2006 World Cup. Barack Obama was elected as the first African-American president eight years ago and 15 years ago the world stood in despair watching United 175 crash into the second tower of the World Trade Center.

These events and more have contributed toward our growth as individuals and we have all experienced these events together.

Now in 2016 we are faced with the reality of the future. We now have hoverboards that explode, we are entering an election year that proves democracy works because Donald Trump is running and the Bay Area is finally getting an another Super Bowl since 1985.

This year is a new beginning. The Spartan Daily has completed half the cycle of the school year and we are excited to bring news that connects with students, faculty and staff.

The Spartan Daily is also expanding its presence on social media and with that we are introducing our new Snapchat account. Technology has become a thing of our lives and with the popularity of Snapchat you can expect more news through our social media.

This semester is the beginning of the election year, you can expect more articles that focus on each candidate and the race to becoming the next President of the United States. We will also be closely covering the Associated Students elections happening this semester.

We are also beginning a more indepth look at the lives of different students around campus, including following the lives of student athletes, commuters and undocumented students.

Last semester, in our last issue we ran an editorial that addressed the concerns of the continuation of a daily print version of the Spartan Daily.

As of now, we will continue publishing every Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday throughout the semester.

What we expect from you is feedback. We are always open for constructive criticism in the form of letters to the editors or if you read something that entices you, share your insight.

Enjoy your semester, pick up a copy of the Daily and don't forget to vote!

JUMP OFF THE BANDWAGON

By Kato Guzman
Staff Writer

The bandwagon effect can alienate any core fan base and sometimes it is a necessary evil to get your way but that evil is not worth it. The bandwagon effect needs to stop.

Part of any hardcore fan lifestyle is prided on being an outcast from mainstream society and finding a place among like minded individuals where they can gather things and talk about no one else stands. On May 5, 1977, Star Wars hit theaters and blew away moviegoers across the nation. From that first trademark screen crawl to that final scrolling credit, Star Wars changed the lives of many moviegoers.

Since then, there has been a strong niche Star Wars fan base which prides itself on Star Wars trivia, factoids and collectibles. Every few years, another Star Wars movie is released and Star Wars mania sweeps the nation. Everyone becomes a Star Wars fan and the pretty girl from class who once ridiculed someone for quoting Yoda is posting on Facebook threatening people with deletion if they spoil The Force Awakens because it suddenly means the world to her. The herd stampedes and people like this follow.

This loss of identity leaves many lifelong fans criticizing the mainstream populace because of their alienation. Luckily for them as the media frenzy dissipates, their lives return to normal and no one will know anything about Star Wars until the next installment.

The unfortunate flipside to this situation is that if there was no hype for the herds to follow, the movie may not even be made. "The Force Awakens" steamrolled box office competition becoming the fastest movie to reach $1 billion, according to Cinemablend. This would never have been the case if it weren't for those pesky bandwagon fans and now Star Wars is willing to give fans more of what they want. This bandwagon effect is a prime example of a herd mentality.

That double-edged lightsaber can even work in favor of unfavorable candidates. A paper published by Stanford researchers called Public Opinion polls a "self-fulfilling prophecy." The writers, David Rothschild and Neil Malhotra, suggest that when polls are conducted people often fear being wrong so they pick whichever candidate is already ahead.

If a leading poll is reported but incorrect, that may suddenly become the leading poll in real life as a result of this effect.

This might explain why Donald Trump leads in the polls every time he makes an outrageous statement. He becomes popular and people bandwagon onto the growing trend and polls reflect this.

The term itself comes from the 1800s when circuses would parade through towns on a literal bandwagon and crowds would gather to watch.

Politicians jumped in with the popularity of these bandwagons and began using it to boost their own popularity. The term was coined shortly after by P.T. Barnum of Barnum and Bailey.

People are scared to be wrong and follow the herd. It seems fitting that a circus with a clown coined the term which explains how Trump managed to lead in polls.

The bandwagon effect has more downsides than upsides. It would be better to have a society of free-thinking and self-realized individuals than to have an undeserving politician in office or one more Star Wars trilogy. It's dangerous to follow the herd because one day the herd may run off the side of a cliff.

The NFL will NEVER be a safe game

By Kavin Mistry
Executive Producer

It is incredibly easy to jump to conclusions when watching a football game. You see a dangerous hit on a player and immediately assume there was intent to cause pain.

Football is the most scrutinized sport. Whether it is because of how often players are being hurt, the growing number of concussions or the inability of the NFL to handle these issues correctly.

A few weeks ago there was a highly talked about incident in the Wild Card playoff game between the Cincinnati Bengals and the Pittsburgh Steelers.

As the Steelers were attempting to drive down the field to make a comeback in the fourth quarter, there was one gruesome play when Steelers wide receiver Antonio Brown leaped to try and catch the ball when Bengals defender Vontaze Burfict came across and hit him in the head with his shoulder, giving Brown a brutal concussion.

After the play was over, Burfict was penalized for the hit, much to the dismay of the Bengals home crowd and their teams sideline. Social media posts flooded the Internet of people saying how Burfict was trying to intentionally injure Brown, how what he did was immoral or that he should be suspended for a long time.

What those people do not understand is that the hit has been legal in the NFL for sometime until the rule was recently changed in the last year. However, in the eyes of the everyday viewer, it is understandable for people to react as so.

But what people fail to see or understand when watching this gruesome hit on their television is the other side of the story.

Deion Sanders, former 49er player and now NFL analyst said it best after the game. "I really feel like Burfict was really trying to avoid this hit because the way he held his shoulder in," said Sanders in their postgame show.

When you go back and look at the play from the perspective of the defender, he is running at his top speed at the receiver, assuming that the catch is going to be made. Since the ball was not caught, there was nothing that Burfict could have done to avoid hitting Brown the way he did.

Now, I am not saying that I am okay with that hit. I am simply stating that the contact that ensued was unavoidable.

So, why should he be fined and suspended for doing something that was out of his control?

If Brown made the catch, Burfict would have hit him in the arm or stomach and we would not even be discussing this.

There is a fine line between blatant intent to hurt or injure a player, and being unable to stop yourself going full speed at someone.

This is not the only example. The most commonly penalized play for a defender stems from their inability to stop themselves when they hit a quarterback a second or two after he releases the ball.

There is no way that a player running full speed to sack a quarterback can stop in his tracks when the quarterback releases the ball if he is a step or two away from him, it is physically impossible.

In 2010, in a study done by SB Nation, there were 84 penalty flags thrown for "roughing the passer," which was a significant increase from the 69 in 2009.

Many might wonder why the NFL has not looked into changing these rules, but there is nothing they are going to do to stop penalties from being thrown on these plays.

In fact, these penalties for unnecessary roughness or hit on a defenseless receiver have only started to become called more often by NFL officials because the league controls the game.

Football is no longer the same as it used to be. It took a while for me to understand how this is true, until I took a step back and looked at how the NFL has been handling injuries in football.

Ever notice how ever since concussions have become a big problem in the NFL that the commissioner, Roger Goodell keeps saying that the league is trying to become safer?

That is a fat lie and a joke.

Football is inherently a dangerous sport, the mere nature of how the game is played makes it unsafe to anyone who puts on pads and takes the field. For Goodell to come out and say that the league is doing what it can to make the game safer is his way of brainwashing all fans into thinking that having officials flag plays that seem "dirty" to the fans eyes will lead them to believe that they care.

When in reality, all the NFL is doing is trying to save its image. Let's face it, it is no secret that more players are deciding to retire now at a younger age because of the fear of the injuries that come along with playing the sport and Goodell knows that.

The NFL is trying to use flags as band aids to try and cover up their injury problems.

Fans of the game need to understand this and not continue to be brainwashed into believing everything that comes out of Goodell's mouth.

Football is not a safe and it never will be.

The NFL can be made safe for players

By Dakotah Zabroski
Opinion Editor

Playing football is inheritably dangerous, there is no denying that. However that doesn't mean the game can be made safer.

The NFL is under heavy fire after learning that several retired players have developed chronic traumatic encephalopathy. In a study by Frontline, 87 of 91 players tested were found to have some form of CTE.

The data may be misleading because only brains that were thought to have something wrong with them were dissected.

Nethertheless, it is a shocking number and the NFL needs to crack down on players who deliver "dirty hits."

In the first round of the NFL playoffs, Pittsburgh Steelers wide receiver Antonio Brown was concussed by Cincinnati Bengals linebacker Vontaze Burfict after taking a vicious hit while going over the middle of the field.

Burfict received a three game suspension for his actions, and quite frankly he deserves all of it. He is a repeat offender and has been fined several times before but that still hasn't stopped him from delivering nasty hits.

I understand the NFL is brutal but I'm sick of players who like they're trying to hurt someone.

The NFL needs to step up their enforcing policies, typically players get fined for their actions, but clearly that isn't enough.

Suspending players is a great way to ensure players are aware of and take responsibility for their reckless actions.

Just one hit can cause a concussion that can cause permanent brain damage that will forever impact a player's life.

As more research shed lights on concussions, NFL players are coming out and speaking about their experiences and life after football.

Former wide receiver Antwaan Randle El has come out and admitted that he would have changed how he acted out his career with the knowledge he knows now.

"Having knowledge and understanding now the repercussions of brain injuries and concussions, I would've did it differently when it comes to playing the game of football and understanding, 'I took a hit, I'm not feeling quite right, I need to come out,'" said Randle El in an interview with Dan Patrick.

Sure you can argue that you should let them play and "boys will be boys," but is putting people's well-being in danger really worth our entertainment?

Players are taking their own lives because they can't deal with the pain that head trauma has caused them. Former NFL players Dave Duerson, Ray Easterling and Junior Seau have all taken their lives in the past four years and all had CTE.

CTE is being found in players as young as 27. That's just a few years older than most of us at SJSU, just to put into perspective how young that is.

Former Giants safety Tyler Sash suffered at least five concussions over his career, so it was no surprise to me that researchers found high levels of CTE when he passed away at 27.

I'm not saying the NFL should be banned, because the reality is the NFL is here to stay. I'll even admit that I look forward to Sundays so I can sit on my couch, open a brew and watch some football.

However, players need to be held way more responsible for their actions. A five second play can impact a player's whole life.

The NFL needs to protect its players like they do with quarterbacks.

The league actually got something right by suspending Burfict for three games.

I'm willing to bet he'll think twice before delivering a nasty blow.

Most athletes love what they do so they hate missing gametime, suspending players from games is the only way to get the point across.

The NFL needs to realize that basic human decency and human health is far more valuable than money.

Until the league wakes up and realizes this there will always be a concussion problem.

Winter recap

By Nick Avila
Staff Writer

While many Spartans enjoyed their break, Spartan athletes were working hard during the holidays, and these are the top events you missed.

The Spartan football team participated in its first Bowl game since their 2012 Military Bowl victory.

This time around, the Spartans defeated the Georgia State Panthers 27-16. Kenny Potter threw for a touchdown and rushed for another as he helped the Spartans overcome a 16-13 deficit in the fourth quarter, earning the game's MVP honors.

Spartan running back Tyler Ervin rushed for 132 yards, finishing the year with 1,601 total rushing yards.

With the Cure Bowl victory, the Spartans finished with a 6-7 record, and earned their first trip back to the postseason since 2012.

Shifting towards the court, the women's basketball team has had an up and down showing this past month. After ending the year with a victory and winning three of its first four games in 2016, the Spartans have dropped their previous three games, two of which were by less than six points.

As of the team's most recent loss to New Mexico, Riana Byrd is 22 points and 56 rebounds away from reaching 1,000 in each category for her collegiate career, which would make her the second Spartan women's basketball player to do so.

The Spartans now have a 6-13 overall record and are 4-4 against teams in the Mountain West Conference.

The SJSU men's basketball team earned its first Mountain West Conference win in almost two years when they defeated Wyoming 62-55.

Junior guard Gary Williams Jr. led the Spartans with 18 points, including six clutch free throws at the end of the game to seal the win. The Spartans are 6-14 overall with a 1-7 conference record heading into the start of the new semester.

In their second meet of the season, the women's track and field team had a solid showing at the Bronco Invitational in Boise, Idaho. The team earned five first place finishes, including two from Cam-bree Harbaugh.

Harbaugh won the long and triple jumps for the Spartans. Also winning was Caitlin Wilson in the 400-meter, Jennifer Beckingham in the 1-mile and Makayla Webb in the 60-meter hurdles.

At the UC Santa Barbara Winter Invite on Jan. 23-24, the water polo team split their weekend match-ups as they went 2-0 on Saturday but dropped two matches on Sunday. Rae Lekness led the Spartans with two goals in their win over UC Irvine, and had three more goals in the victory over Long Beach State. Goalkeeper Tayler Peters had 10 saves in each of the wins. The Spartans now have a 5-3 record.

The women's gymnastics team had a good weekend at Stanford on Jan. 24 as they set the 10th best bars score in school history.

The Spartans also had a season-best score of 194.875 but came in third behind Stanford and UC Berkeley. Maddie Herr and Kaitlin Won each finished with an all-around score of 38.275.

While a lot happened over the break, there's still plenty of action left in the season for these sports.

Number one on Winter's Big 3 is Ryan Welage. A workhorse, he has started in 17 of the 20 games playing an average of 28.7 minutes per game. Welage is second on the team in scoring, with a highlight performance on Jan 16 against Fresno State, when he put on a show, scoring 28 points. He followed it up with a 19 point feat against Boise State. Welage shoots 3 pointers exceptionally well for a big-man, shooting almost 43 % from behind the arc. As of Jan. 26, Welage leads all Mountain West Conference Freshman in made 3 point shots made. Along with being able to shoot, he has also been a force on the boards, where he matched his season high of 10 rebounds twice early on in the season. The lanky freshman came to San Jose State from Greensburg, Indiana, where he attended Greensburg Community High School. As promising prospect, Welage will have plenty of time to develop as a member of the Spartans.

The second star of the winter is the talented Miyo Kobayashi. Saturday, Jan 23, Miyo and the rest of the San Jose State Women's Tennis team were in inside the University of Hawaii Tennis Complex in Honolulu for their match against University of Hawaii. Her match was the last of six singles matches to finish and it would decide the result between the Spartans and Rainbow Warriors. The freshman from Thailand won her first set, but after losing the second, had to recompose herself. With the match on her racquet, she came through, for her team winning the final set 6-3 to claim the win. In the fall, Miyo finished with a total record of 14-9 with an 8-4 record in singles matches. The match in Hawaii marked Kobayashi's first collegiate dual match and she handled it the best way she could The rest of the season looks bright for Kobayashi.

Third in the Big 3 is Dezz Ramos, point guard of the basketball team. A junior transfer from Weber State in Utah, she has played in 18 of 19 possible games this season while including starting in 14 of those. Ramos averages 30.3 minutes per game while leading her team in scoring by a solid amount averaging 19.3 points, more than 7 more points than the next closest. Most of the Spartans offense is created or run through Ramos. Of the 19 games that the team has played, Ramos either led or tied her team for the scoring lead in 14 of them. The pinnacle of her offensive performances this season came against in a game at Wyoming University on Jan 13, she scored 26 points, also recording 2 steals. What separates Ramos is she is not a one dimensional player. She has set and matched her season high of assists on three separate occasions this season, the most recent coming against Boise State on Jan. 20 when she recorded 7 assists. Her skills are on display in every game and she has the stats to back it up.
